SITUATION SUMMARY

Weather of Concern

The National Weather Service is predicting with high confidence a very windy period across the region late through this evening. Prolonged strong southerly wind with peak gusts of 60 mph and greater are anticipated in the valleys, with gusts up to 120 mph possible in the mountains. A period of heavy snow in the Sierra's can be expected, with 1-3 feet forecast above 6,000 feet. At 4,500-7,000 feet the transition from rain to snow should be rather sudden, sometime between 1500 hours and 2100 hours 12/11/14, resulting in several inches of snowfall. The lower valleys across the region are expected to see substantial rainfall below 5,500 feet. Valley areas can expect 2 – 4" of rain and the foothills and mountains will see 5 – 10". Heavy rain through this afternoon will cause rapid river rises and flooding in poor drainage areas. Burn scars will be the most susceptible to flash flooding and debris flows.
